CCTV (closed-circuit television) camera is basically using video cameras to send out a signal to a specific place, to a select number of monitors. The difference between CCTV camera and broadcast television is that the signal is not transmitted openly, as in broadcast television, even though it might use wireless links. CCTV camera is most commonly used for surveillance in certain areas needing close monitoring, such as airports, banks, shops, casinos and military compounds. These systems are sometimes used continuously, but sometimes they are only used as necessary to monitor a specific high-risk event as an added measure of security.

Walter Bruch is credited with designing and installing the very first CCTV system in 1942. This first system was used to observe the launch of V2 rockets. Even today, CCTV recording devices are still employed at launch sites to record flight of the various rockets, while larger rockets are often built with CCTV camera which allows pictures of the operations to be directed by radio link back to earth.

In September 1968, the city of Olean, New York became the first in the United States to use CCTV camera in an effort to stop crime. This thrust the Olean Police Department to the cutting edge of crime-fighting technology. Eventually, CCTV camera became commonplace in stores and banks and other institutions to discourage criminal activity. Today, the use of CCTV camera is very common throughout the entire world. Especially in light of growing fears of crime and terrorism, more and more places are employing the use of CCTV camera, and even in schools as a result of the recent wave of school terrorism.
